

Why are biobanks important?

Biobanks store and preserve samples that contain the genetic material of a species. They enable scientists to access samples more easily, both now and in the future.

From the samples stored in biobanks you can learn a lot of information about a population or a species, information that can help us to protect and conserve the wildlife on our planet.

Can you take the sample to the biobank for it to be stored and made available to researchers?

